City plan to be more open kept secret

Austin City Council Member Laura Morrison is refusing to release an early draft of an ordinance that would alter how the city negotiates with businesses that are offered tax incentives to move here. She says the ordinance would generally make the city's process more open and add chances for public input.

But she would not release a copy despite apparently having shown it to people outside the city government. She said she and other council members are still seeking input from other stakeholders and that process must finish before anything is released publicly. She said the draft is a 'working paper,' a kind of document the city contends it can legally keep private.
